

Consumption as an Investment: I

The fear of goods from Hesiod to Adam Smith

Cosimo Perrotta

Translated by Joan McMullin

Contents

Preface	xvii
Acknowledgements	xviii
1 Introduction: the legacy of the past	1
Increase in consumption as a means of raising productivity	1
Human capital and productive labour	3
Hunger for goods, fear of goods	5
The new goods	6
The birth of agriculture: a new use of the surplus, new values	8
2 The Ancients and inner wealth	11
The Golden Age: decline or progress	11
Rationalism: the allure and the fear of wealth	15
Xenophon and Plato: ancient culture at a crossroads	18
Aristotle: fear of change	21
Aristotle's 'unnatural' needs versus Isocrates' 'conveniences'	24
The development freeze and its socio-cultural roots	21
Socrates' followers in a blind alley: Oeconomica; Eryxias; the Cyrenaics	29
Asceticism and escape from reality: Cynics and Utopians	32
Epicureans and Stoics: the second wasted opportunity	33
The Roman Age: restlessness	36
The supposed idea of progress in antiquity	40
Conclusions	42
3 Patristics: end of the contempt for wealth and labour	43
Beyond the ancient aristocratic ideal	43
The New Testament: poverty in spirit	45
'The rich and the poor are necessary to each other'	47

Millenarianism and 'progress' 49

Frugality, waste and charity in the fourth century 51

'What one gains the other loses' 54

4 Medieval dualism: poverty as an ideal; wealth as a practical goal

Economic dualism and its paradoxes 57

The monastic economy and the reassessment of labour 61

Pauperism, dualism, autonomy 63

The Franciscans and poverty as a life model 66

Thomas Aquinas on wealth-getting 70

The dispute about begging 73

Economic dualism of the Franciscans 75

The impediment in scholastic economic culture 82

5 Italian humanism ignores economic development

Hopes betrayed 87

New ideas on wealth and goods in the fifteenth century 88

'Dignity of man' and civic humanism 92

From the science of man to the rejection of sciences (and of political economy) 97

The sixteenth century: involution of the merchant class 100

Opposing views on wealth 103

The clash over the productive classes 106

Conclusions: from Aristotle to the nobility of labour again 109

6 From alms to human capital: the poor in sixteenth century Spain and England

Capitalist take-off, beggars and the birth of mercantilism 112

The first Spanish poor laws 115

Luis Vives 116

The clash over the reform of alms-giving 118

Other failed attempts in Spain 123

English poor laws to the mid 1500s 127

The organization of human capital 131

A system of 'productive assistance' 134

7 Spain's unproductive consumption

Spain as a negative model 137

Trade dependence and import substitution 139

Projects to promote production 142

American gold and inflation 144

The immobile social structure 146

Aristocratic culture: parasitism and intolerance 150

Contradictions 153

Conclusions 156

8 Expanding production: a (fearful) hunger for goods

From treasure to capital 158

Chrysohedonism or fear of goods? 163

Labour and wealth-getting 166

Raising production 167

Increasing productivity 173

The surplus 176

9 Productive and unproductive labour

Defining productive labour 179

Before Petty 181

Petty, founder of the concept 183

From Petyt to Cantillon 187

The eighteenth century: commerce and services as productive labour 190

Harris and Genovesi: productive labour and development 193

The theory of stages 195

Graslin, Ferguson: the end of the use values approach 198

Conclusions 202

10 Foreign trade: fostering productive consumption/productive labour

Foreign trade as a means for development 204

Mercantilism and free trade: a misleading question 205

Three theories of the favourable trade balance 210

'Profit upon alienation' and exports in excess 211

The third theory: exchange of goods with different productive potentials 215

Conclusions 221

11 The Enlightenment theory of development: consumption as an investment	223
'Luxury of the poor' in the seventeenth century	223
Increased consumption as an incentive	225
The misunderstandings over the 'subsistence wage'	228
The concept of 'moderate luxury'	231
Moderate luxury as productive consumption	234
Increasing consumption in order to increase productivity	231
General conclusions: the importance of the Enlightenment approach	240
Notes	244
References	291
Subject index	364
Name index	370