

Television violence and the adolescent boy

WILLIAM A. BELSON
BA, PhD

Reader in Research Methods

North East London Polytechnic

SAXON  HOUSE

CONTENTS

Introduction	vii
1 An extended summary of the investigation and recommendations for action	1
2 The development of hypotheses for investigation	24
3 The research strategy for investigating causal hypotheses	60
4 The construction of a technique for measuring the extent and nature of boys' exposure to television violence	92
5 Developing indices of exposure to the other media: newspapers, comics, violent films	178
6 The construction of a technique for measuring the extent and nature of boys' involvement in violent behaviour	189
7 The construction of measures of boys' attitudes towards violence and towards their social environment	255
8 The construction of measures of boys' preoccupation with, feeling of willingness to commit, desire to commit, acts of violence of the particular kind featured in television programmes; some other measures	287
9 The survey procedure	308
10 A short introduction to the findings	340
11 Findings: the nature and distribution of violence amongst boys	351
12 Findings: the tenability of hypotheses about the effects of exposure to television violence upon the extent of violent behaviour by boys. (Investigating hypotheses I-IV)	364
13 The tenability of hypotheses about the effects of exposure to different kinds of television violence upon the extent of violent behaviour by boys	413

14	The tenability of hypotheses about the effects of exposure to television violence upon four specific forms of behaviour: violence in the company of other boys; violence in the form of annoying, irritating, argumentative behaviour; verbal violence; violence in sport or play. (Hypotheses 5-8)	430
15	The tenability of the hypotheses that seeing particular acts of violence on television increases boys' preoccupation with such acts; boys' desire to commit such acts. (Hypotheses 9, 10, 11)	447
16	The tenability of the two hypotheses to the effect that exposure to television violence makes boys more callous in relation to real life violence – both violence going on around them and violence that they hear about through the news. (Hypotheses 18, 19)	467
17	The tenability of a group of hypotheses dealing with the effects of exposure to television violence upon boys' attitudes towards the concepts of violence and towards its use. (Hypotheses 12, 20, 21, 22)	478
18	The tenability of the hypothesis that exposure to television violence produces problems over sleep. (Hypothesis 17)	500
19	The tenability of the hypotheses about the effects of exposure to television violence upon consideration for others and upon respect for authority. (Hypotheses 13 and 14)	507
20	The principal findings and a commentary on them.	519