

Ideas and forms of tragedy
from Aristotle to the Middle Ages

HENRY ANSGAR KELLY

Professor, Department of English, University of California, Los Angeles

CAMBRIDGE
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Contents

Preface	page	xiii
List of abbreviations		xvii
Greek and Roman poetics		1
× (1) Aristotle on the tragic in general		1
(2) The Roman tradition		5
Modes and subjects of Roman tragedy		16
(1) Ways of performing tragedy		16
(2) Tragedies read, tragedies lived		23
(3) Rash generalizations of tragic themes		27
Early medieval clues and conjectures		36
(1) Isidore of Seville		36
(2) Remigius and Remigians		50
(3) Non-Remigians, Senecans, Horatians, and later Isidorians		57
(4) Papias the protolexicographer		64
The twelfth-century scene		68
(1) William of Conches and the commentaries on Boethius		68
(2) Metaphorical tragedy		78
(3) Tragic style and new tragedies		92
(4) Continuing tradition: the lexicographers		103
The high Middle Ages: discoveries and oblivions		111
(1) Aristotle: a lost opportunity		111
(2) Nicholas Trevet on Boethius and Seneca		125
(3) Seneca at Padua		134
(4) Dante and his commentators		144
(5) Boethius in French		157
6 Final variations		169
(1) England: Chaucer and the future		170

Contents

(2) Laments in France	175
(3) Italian Latinists	185
(4) Theory and practice in Spain	194
Conclusion	218
Bibliography	223
Index	244