PREFACE	xiii
INTRODUCTION	1
PART I. PRELIMINARY MATERIAL
1. THE IRREDUCIBILITY OF AFFECTIVITY	17
1. Emotions and affectivity	24
2. The content account	26
3. Irreducibility to desire	28
4. Irreducibility to reason	38
5. Irreducibility via more complex accounts	51
6. Feelings are rarely merely feelings	53
7. Concluding remarks	54
2. HOW EMOTIONS REVEAL VALUE	56
1. A start on some issues	56
2. Problematic issues about the values emotions reveal	58
3. Whether all emotions contain or reveal value, with special focus on interest and intellectual emotions	65
4. Some relations between my claim and emotivism and naturalism	73
5. Perhaps evaluatively revealing emotions only reveal values	82
6. The unsavory connection between the content claim and the information claim	86

PART II. EMOTIONS AND VALUE: SOME EPISTEMOLOGICAL AND CONSTITUTIVE RELATIONS

3. EMOTIONAL PROBLEMS SUGGEST EPISTEMOLOGICAL PROBLEMS	91
1. False truisms about reason and emotions	91
2. Psychoanalytic connections	108
3. Unhealthy philosophical accounts of emotions	112
4. Ordinary ways good emotions are important for good evaluations	114
4. DO THESE CONNECTIONS SHOW EMOTIONS IMPORTANT FOR VALUE, OR DO THEY SHOW SOMETHING ELSE?	122
1. Do emotional defects explain evaluative defects, or do they share a common cause?	122
2. Is there a real or healthy distinction between emotions and their underlying patterns?	129
3. Perhaps emotions are important, not for evaluations, but only for people as evaluators	133
4. Is this just the information claim?	136
5. EMOTIONS ARE IMPORTANT FOR EVALUATION AND VALUE	138
1. Medical treatment	138
2. Justice and formalistic ethics	139
3. The right of self-defense and emotions	150
4. How being a good person and acting well requires emotions	152
5. Many ordinary goods, especially interpersonal ones, are emotional	160
6. EMOTIONS AS CONSTITUENTS AND AS ADDED PERFECTIONS	169
1. Emotions as added perfections	169
2. Emotions as constituents	174
3. Further issues	177
4. A suggestion about pleasure in books VII and X of the Nicomachean Ethics	182
5. How we are also Aristotelians about pleasure	184

7. SOME FURTHER WAYS EMOTIONS HELP WITH EVALUATIVE KNOWLEDGE	188
1. Emotions as epistemologically useful for justifications and for countertransference	188
2. Some other claims about the epistemological usefulness of emotions	190
3. Some general points about emotions and practical, often unarticulated, evaluative knowledge	192
4. How emotional-evaluative knowledge can be practical	201
5. Emotions as important, but perhaps not necessary, for evaluative knowledge	203
PART III. CASE STUDIES: PHILOSOPHICAL AND OTHER COMPLEXITIES OF EMOTIONS
8. THE INTERDEPENDENCE OF EMOTIONS AND PSYCHOLOGY	209
1. Killing another person – just by way of example	209
2. Empathy and sympathy	214
3. Shame	217
4. Painful emotions	230
9. AFFECTIVITY AND SELF-CONCERN	243
1. Spiritual maladies	244
2. Anger and pride	246
3. Harm, fear, and pity	253
4. Fear	254
5. Pity and self-pity	258
6. Concluding remarks	264
10. THE COMPLEX EVALUATIVE WORLD OF ARISTOTLE'S ANGRY MAN	265
1. Orgē and value	265
2. Narcissism and Aristotle's angry man	268
3. Slights, flattery, and recognition by others	286
4. The personal and the impersonal in some emotions	298
5. Who gets angry on behalf of whom	306
6. Closeness and identification	307
7. Size	320
8. Conclusion	322

11. SOME FINAL CONCLUSIONS	323
